The Stations of the Cross is one of the oldest of Christian popular devotions - it is usually dated back to the early 4th century – though the fourteen images in Catholic churches only began to appear commonly in the seventeenth century. So they have been associated with specifically Catholic, or Anglo- Catholic, iconography. The Good Friday practice can be seen as kind of pilgrimage: charting as it does, Christ's last day on earth as a man. It was and is the custom to follow the Via Dolorosa in Jerusalem as a Holy Week pilgrimage but those who could not make a journey there physically, could follow in spirit.

Though the tradition is old, I find that it can be, psychologically, a journey and a meditation altogether applicable to modern times.

We are all condemned to death as we age, the more that weighs upon us; we must all carry a cross and many must face a cross of personal affliction; we all fall – the first time, the second time, the third time. We all need a Simon of Cyrene to come to our aid and we all need a St Veronica, metaphorically, to offer comfort. We can all understand the idea of a mother suffering to see the sufferings of a son or daughter. In an era where exposure can be remorseless, we may all be 'stripped of our garments'. Anyone who has ever been shamed, humiliated, bullied or exposed to ridicule knows about this station in life. There is a growing literature on the experience of those who have been publically shamed sometimes via the internet. It is a beautiful, though sometimes mentally agonising, devotion, full of truth about the human condition.
